EDITOR'S NOTE

SACRED SPACE

*In the words of mahatria, Not everyone woke up this morning,
So let your first words be, "Thank you for another day of life."
Make this day count.*

Children are the future citizens and leaders. Teaching children values that will benefit society, will help them empathize with others, and hold accountability for their actions, and these are the best lessons parents and teachers can instill in children.

Cont'd...

Showing gratitude and helping people out is the first thing that is taught to every student. Examples of making small efforts in daily lives are, planting a tree, donating blood, feeding the hungry, or donating clothes to the less-privileged. Spending a day at an orphanage, scribing for the blind etc can bring a lot of joy to the giver and receiver.

Young children can help in lots of ways like asking for donations to an anti-hunger charity drive. Volunteering is another way out for children to contribute to the society. While some volunteer roles have an age minimum, younger children can participate in local community initiatives by creating awareness on a litter free society.

Our planet needs our kindness now more than ever. Some of the changes in the way we have been living in the recent years, have led to global warming. We need to include in our daily routine, habits like recycling and composting, turning off the lights when we leave a room, and walking or cycling, which will help in conserving our resources.

Children have the ability to bring smiles, giggles, and warmth, which combats the depression and isolation some senior citizens undergo, living away from their kith and kin. A visit to a home for the aged to talk to older people, or even asking them if they need any help, a friendly visit to an elderly neighbour with a homemade card or picture, are ways in which children can contribute to society, spreading radiance around them. We can make our lives worthwhile by sharing, having empathy for others, adding value to others' lives, and respecting others' feelings. Let's leave behind a legacy of goodwill and love to make our lives count.

"The value of a man's life is in the counting of his positive influence on others."

Sujatha Jayaprakash
